It establishes principles for guiding healthy living and working conditions and legislation in this area. Hygiene closely cooperates with other fields, especially epidemiology and social medicine – all three investigate and influence the conditions for promoting the health of the population and preventing diseases. Epidemiology studies the occurrence of diseases in population groups in place and time concerning their causes. It deals with the laws of the epidemic process– and theoretical and practical issues of population protection against infectious and non-infectious diseases. Social medicine examines social and economic factors that determine the quality and level of people's health and forms of care.
